

CCR&R Parent/Provider Newsletter- September 2018

Welcome our newest staff member!

Courtney Cartwright– Quality Enhancement Coordinator

Originally from Bath, I began my career in education working in the Beaufort County School system as a teacher's assistant. I moved to New Bern a little over five years ago to begin working in the Early Childhood field. After spending five years working in the North Carolina Pre-Kindergarten program, I am excited to join the Child Care Resource and Referral family and as a Quality Enhancement Coordinator I am looking forward to getting to know the amazing providers in Craven County.

When not working, I love spending time with family and friends and working with young people through church activities. I hold a Bachelor of Arts degree in Religious Studies from Brevard College and a Bachelor of Science degree in Early Childhood Education from the University of Mount Olive. I am looking forward to not only continuing my education in the Early Childhood field, but also working with the many wonderful providers in our community.

Behavior– When Kids Fail

Most children can handle success-but how can parents help their children handle failure?

First, your child needs to know that you're on their side, that you accept them for that they are, win or lose. Your comments should reflect on what they've done, not on what they "are".

Second, don't be kind by being dishonest. Your child knows when they have not done well, when they have "failed". When you acknowledge that you know this too, but that it isn't the end of the world, your child has confidence in you to reflect an honest value to them.

Finally, let your child know every day and in many ways that you love them. A child needs a lot of hugging, even at times when their behavior is definitely "unhuggable".

As children try to find their place in the world, they look to their parents for guidance and support. Make sure you give your child the room they need to learn and make mistakes, but also make sure they know you're on their side– win or lose.

Social Skills– All Children Need Special People

Your growing child needs people. They need to see, listen to and feel people as a natural part of the world around them.

In addition to their parents, who are the most important people in their world, there are other special people who are very important: grandparents and other relatives; friends and caregivers. From them-and their parents-they learn that they belong and they matter.

Parents and other special people provide an atmosphere in which the young child learns that they are important. They notice the child, talk to them, laugh with them when they are happy and show their concern when they fall and hurt themselves. They say "hello" to them in a special way because they belong to them. In all these interactions they send a message to the child: "You are important. You matter. We care. You belong." Long before they can understand specific words, the child gets this message.

But it is a fact of modern life that in today's world, families get scattered. Most often children live in one community while their special people may be scattered from coast to coast. When this happens, the child doesn't get all the messages they need because their special people simply are not part of their daily life. If this is the case for your family, you may well protest, 'But what can I do? There are no special family people here.'

One simple solution is to try for regular visits to your child's special people so that they have a number of contacts with them. Such visits are extremely important and they are well worth the time and effort they require.

Another solution is to find substitute "special people" among your own circle of friends. Each time they are in your house, they would be especially aware of ways they could pay attention to your child.

You might also have a relationship with one or two older people who could serve as substitute grandparents-and you may be pleasantly surprised at how delighted some older couples would be to play this role.
